

A learning community is a set of courses grouped together with a common theme. The instructors work together to create assignments and learning experiences that cross into each class. The same group of students register for the courses, creating a group of people there to support one another's academic achievements.

LCOM 1715 – Women's Lives and Literature

Women's Lives and Literature is a learning community in which students take the following 2 courses during the same semester: HIST 1770 History of Women in the United States and ENGL 2776 Women in Literature. The classes will be connected through integrated assignments and cross-course reading. In this learning community and through the context of women in literature, students will examine how women understood their lives as individuals and as members of families and communities. The course also explores strategies through which women of diverse races, classes, and ethnicities struggled to control their own lives and identities. Special focus is given to how ideologies of gender, race, class and sexuality framed American society and culture. This learning community meets with the MN Transfer Curriculum in Goal 5 (History, Social Sciences & Behavioral Sciences), Goal 6 (Humanities & Fine Arts), Goal 7 (Human Diversity), and Goal 9 (Ethical & Civic Responsibility).
